

Say Hello to Kared.

This is Kared. Kared's companions are all named Kared. Kared originally stood for "Killer Attack Rose of Evil Doom", but that name no longer applies to just roses. Now, the name "Kared" applies to succulents, jungle plants, orchids, and even Swiss chard. For years, the proprietor of the Texas Triffid Ranch has been performing terrible experiments upon innocent flora.

Nutrient levels.
Air layering.
Hybridization.
Temperature variables.
Cloning.

As a result, while its tormentor screams how "My Kareds are the supreme beings in the universe!", Kared's kin are seeking sanctuary. The testing is done, and they seek a home.

Take some time to adopt a Kared. All it needs is carbon dioxide, light, water, decent soil, and the occasional bit of fertilizer. In return, it offers oxygen, water vapor, and an end to the horror. Give a Kared a sunny windowsill or patio placement, and watch the wonders of photosynthesis and tropisms firsthand. Because it's better than being a lab subject, isn't it?
